What if Australia had a strategic presence on Christmas & Cocos Islands?

An expanded and well-resourced Australian strategic presence on Christmas and Cocos (Keeling) Islands would enable closer maritime security and other forms of defence cooperation with a range of Indo-Pacific partners.

Are the Cocos and Christmas Islands a strategic island?

While the IOT comprise the Cocos (Keeling) Islands and Christmas Island, it's important to point out that defence capability and strategic issues vary greatly between them. But their strategic value is limited by their remoteness and difficulties of resupply, particularly by sea.

What would happen if the Cocos Islands were built?

The work required to develop a main base at the Cocos Islands would be extensive, highly damaging to the environment and disruptive for the local population. The resupply of fuel to support the anti-air defences of the islands would be extremely difficult.

Would resupply be a problem if the Cocos Islands were under air attack?

Resupply in such quantities would be highly problematic if the islands were under air attack from Southeast Asia. There's also the issue of weather. Diego Garcia is five degrees closer to the equator than the Cocos Islands which means that it's much less affected by cyclones and bad weather.

Is a major development of the Cocos Islands like Diego Garcia a good idea?

There are several reasons why a major development of the Cocos Islands like Diego Garcia isn't a good idea. In comparison with Diego Garcia, the land area of the Cocos Islands is smaller (only about 14 square kilometres) and the main lagoon less navigable.
